For several weeks Spanish police were looking for many valuable things that had mysteriously disappeared from bags and suitcases locked inside the luggage compartment of a bus travelling between Girona Airport and Barcelona. After one journey, when some things were missing once again, one of the passengers noticed a rather large suitcase among the others. Police opened it and found a man hidden inside. The man's friend had bought a bus ticket and put the suitcase into the luggage hold. After the bus left the airport, the man got out of the suitcase and opened the other luggage looking for valuables. Before the bus arrived in Barcelona, he zipped himself back into his hiding place.

An Unusual Request

It's common during Chile's extremely hot summers to see men wearing suits and ties. Now the government has decided to ask men to take off their ties, unfasten their top shirt buttons and turn down the air conditioning. The government hopes that doing so can save the country around $10 million on energy during the summer. Energy conservation is a key problem in Chile, a country that produces almost no oil and gas. Instead, the country strongly depends on hydro-electric power, but that is often very limited during the long, hot months of summer.

But M3nsa has made his name as a part of the pidgin-rap duo FUN BOIS together with his compatriot Wanlov. Mona Lisa* Stolen 100 Years Ago

On August 21, 1911, the most famous work of art in the world, the Mona Lisa, was stolen from the Louvre Museum in Paris. A visiting artist, Louis Bérour, was the first to notice the blank space on the wall, where the DaVinci masterpiece had hung for the previous five years, and nervously asked the guards about it. The guards were initially uninterested, thinking that the painting had been removed for photographs. It was late in the afternoon before the museum realised the Mona Lisa had been stolen.

The French police did their best to catch the thief. They questioned lots of people—among them the poet Guillaume Apollinaire, who once said the Louvre should be burnt down. However, the radical poet strongly denied the crime and said it was done by his friend, a young artist named Pablo Picasso. Soon the investigation came to a dead end though. The police closed the case without arresting anybody, believing that the painting was lost forever.

It was two years later when the Mona Lisa appeared again and the world finally learned what had happened. A Louvre employee called Vincenzo Peruggia, originally from Italy, took the painting off the wall, hid it in a cupboard until closing time, and then just walked out with it under his coat. He kept it in his flat for two years and then decided to try to sell it—not to a private collector, but to the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Italy. Of course the gallery had already been informed of the missing painting and Peruggia was finally arrested by the Italian police.

Peruggia's motive was clearly patriotic. He loved learning about the rich history of his country and felt the French had no right to keep this piece of Italian art treasure in the Louvre Museum forever. The Italian courts apparently agreed because Peruggia was sent to prison for the robbery for only six months. The painting was eventually returned undamaged to the Louvre, after it had made an unauthorised exhibition tour in museums all over Italy. Today the Mona Lisa is again well-guarded in the Louvre, where it gets the attention of 6 million people every year.
